

Theorem. The gradient vector field of the function $z = f(x, y)$ is perpendicular to its contour lines. At each point, the direction of the gradient is the direction in which z increases most rapidly; the length is equal to the maximum rate of increase.